

Project Determination

Over the course of the program, you will implement a project that will systematically impact your workplace. Throughout your courses you'll gain a deeper understanding of how to implement your project, ultimately to benefit and impact the stakeholders that you serve. This form will help you think through when and how you plan to implement your project. Signed form should be uploaded to your portfolio.

What problem do you want to solve at your workplace?

I am investigating the issue of students' cell phone use and its impact on academic and social aspects of school. To understand how it affects the Latin community, I will gather quantitative and qualitative data on faculty and staff's views on cell phone use on campus. This will include their perspectives on cell phone use and policies and how faculty manage phone use in their classrooms. After reviewing the current phone use policies, I will present my findings to any relevant stakeholders on campus.

How do you know it's a problem?

The use of cell phones in schools is a prevailing issue because it is consistently discussed among teachers. Also, many education periodicals and general news websites consistently highlight the issue. Today, many schools are adapting their cell phone policies to address this problem.

What research are you grounding your project in?

I plan to conduct research surveys on campus (faculty/staff only), focusing on questions or concerns that upper school administrators may have. Some preliminary work has already been done. Beyond on-site research, I will source at least two academic articles about the impacts of phone use at school that highlight differing cell phone policies and their impacts. I will also read books on the subject. Lastly, I will search out administrators at other schools who may let me examine their policy and ask questions about its effectiveness.
